His studies at Rome were after Raphael and Michelangelo, at Parma, after Correggio and Parmigiano, as well as after the most distinguished Venetian painters. His pictures were painted with the utmost minuteness, in which every object, even to each hair, was precisely attended to. He was more employed in subjects of the fable, which he treated with elegance and grace, in the style of Titian, but sometimes with a freedom which procured him the title of 'Libertino.' He died at Venice in 1687."
